Abstract

The researcher experienced self-healing while studying Kawruh Jiwa Suryomentaram for the purpose of revising her undergraduate thesis. Kawruh Jiwa Suryomentaram is knowledge about the soul/raos and its nature. This research is about the dynamics of self-healing experiences that researcher has experienced and is currently experiencing. The research method is autoethnography. The research data includes life memories, diaries, medical records, psychological reports, and interview transcripts with five significant others. Data analysis according to Chang (2008) includes fracturing and connecting, zooming-in and zooming-out, as well as balancing scientific and non-scientific orientations. The results of the research show that before experiencing self-healing, the researcher tends to have difficulty accepting her conditions and after experiencing self-healing, the researcher becomes more able to accept her conditions. This research shows that Kawruh Jiwa Suryomentaram is beneficial for the psychological well-being of researcher.
