ABSTRACT

The efforts of companies in disclosing sustainability reports are inseparable from the practice of community development, which is a significant issue in the social aspect. This study integrates Voluntary Disclosure Theory and Stakeholder Theory to observe community development practices as a manifestation of ethical business. The study identifies community development practices based on the Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) Program Categories for Social Development, which include charity, infrastructure, capacity building, and empowerment, as well as the contexts influencing companies in their community development practices disclosed in sustainability reports.

This research employs a qualitative method with a content analysis approach to 36 sustainability reports of companies ranked at the Asian level (Asia Sustainability Reporting Rating/ASRRAT 2022) organized by the National Center for Sustainability Reporting (NCSR). The terms 'assistance' and 'program' illustrate how community development practices are conducted in Indonesia. The term 'assistance' is affiliated with charity and infrastructure, while 'program' is related to capacity building and empowerment.

Nevertheless, community development practices result from the interaction between corporate culture, socio-economic context, and regulatory context. These three aspects significantly influence the disclosure of the company's social performance, reflected in the community development practices in the sustainability reports. This study aims to contribute to and reflect on the evolution of CSR, where the disclosure of community development practices is dynamic and adaptive.
