

Abstract

Indonesia is a country with a lot of differences in many social aspects and diverse culturally. This situation is potentially causing conflicts within the nation, but in reality conflict caused by such differences rarely happened. That shows that differences doesn't inhibit trust and cooperation behaviour in Indonesia much. Such behaviours are possibly affected by other factors big enough to offset conflict caused by differences. Age, religiosity, sex, place of living, risk preference, and education level are factors that influence trust and cooperation analyzed using Indonesian data.
