This legal study aims to ascertain and analyze the implementation of legal protection for the safety of health workers during the Covid-19 pandemic at the Tarakan Regional General Hospital. In doing so, this legal study describes the implementation of prevention and accountability measures carried out by the Tarakan Regional General Hospital in providing work safety protection for its existing health workers.

The research for this legal study was conducted using a normative-empirical method that combines library research with field research. The literature research was carried out by exploring, collecting, reading, reviewing, and studying references from secondary data to be compared with the results of the field research conducted by the interview method.

The research of this legal study deemed that: first, Tarakan Regional General Hospital has been carrying out a relevant initiative to prevent the transmission of Covid-19 to health workers. The initiative has been working quite well and is in accordance with applicable regulations. The only thing lacking is the fact that it has not been fully optimized, because there are still some health workers who refuse to comply with the stipulated provisions that have been established by the Hospital. Second, Tarakan Regional General Hospital has been carrying out adequate accountability measures for the safety of its on-duty health workers, under applicable regulations.
